This highly rustic park is situated along the Nogawa River, covered with a grassy plain and groves of trees. It has a nursery where seedlings are raised to be planted in parks and along streets in Tokyo. One can observe how the trees are grown while taking a stroll in the park.

In mid April, the sato-zakura cherry trees along the park paths form amazing tunnels of flowers. The park is part of the Musashino forest along with Fuchunomori Park, Sengenyama Park, Musashino-no-mori Park, Tama Cemetery, Nogawa Park, Jindai Botanical Gardens, Jindaiji Temple, the National Astronomical Observatory, and other sites.

Nursery

This is the source of greenery for Tokyo. Administered by the Tokyo Metropolitan Government, the nursery supplies trees for parks and streetsides.

The Musashino Nursery raises around 4,000 trees and shrubs of 65 species, including Japanese zelkovas and stone oak. It also conducts surveys, research, and tests on the growth of trees.

Plenty of cherry blossoms

Large trees at the base of Kujirayama Hill that provide shade in summer

Kujirayama Hill ● Named for its shape like a whale (kujira) back, this small hill covers part of the park. It overlooks the hake cliff line on the other side of Nogawa River. Wanpaku (rascal) field, an open grassy area, extends across the north side.

A variety of events are held here every year during summer vacation. Local residents use Wanpaku field and the riverside to carry out those events.

Musashino Harappa (field) Festival
